PUBLIC PROCUREMENT FOR DEVELOPED INDIA

As India marches towards its goal of a USD30 to 35 trillion economy by 2047, government procurement will continue to be one of the critical contributors to overall economic growth. The initiatives and policy-making by the GoI signals creation of an ecosystem that not only incentivises supply-side domestic capacity building (through the “Make in India” indigenisation programme and the PLI Scheme) but also endeavours to create a demand-based market for the products and services offered by Indian businesses. Procurement contracts in recent times have also addressed several contractual risks, especially in terms of payment security and termination thereby improving their bankability especially in concession agreements for development of public infrastructure.

There is, therefore, need for contracts being designed with the allocation of risks that are balanced between the various stakeholders, including the government, and present a sense of understanding of investor sentiments, sectoral risks and commerciality, which are shortcomings that government contracts have otherwise been criticised for. With the recent developments in the procurement framework and the larger regulatory framework for businesses along with the tremendous increase in economic activities, advancements in technology and business tools, government procurement presents immense opportunities for stakeholders across sectors to participate in public procurements and contribute to the India growth story. Admittedly effort will continue to be on leveraging public procurement for social welfare, inclusive economic growth, environment protection, ethical and transparent business operations, procurement capacity building and comprehensive unified law.
